Concept Note

The Sustainable Development Goals (SDGs), established by the United Nations in 2015, emphasize gender equality as both a fundamental human right and a critical factor in achieving sustainable development. Goal 5 specifically calls for the empowerment of all women and girls, ensuring their involvement in decision-making processes, and eliminating discrimination and violence against them. Further, Goal 8 mentions about the decent work and economic growth it emphasizes on the requirement of decent work opportunities and to prevent exploitation of women. Human trafficking remains a constant hurdle for the decent opportunities worldwide.

Human trafficking is one of the most pressing human rights concerns in India today, and the North Eastern region has emerged as a particularly vulnerable zone due to its complex socio-economic, geographical, and political landscape. The porous international borders with Bangladesh, Nepal, and Myanmar; internal displacement; poverty; and lack of awareness make the region a source, transit, and destination point for trafficking, particularly involving women and children.

Tripura, due to its geographical proximity to international borders and significant tribal population, has been identified as a high-risk state. Despite national and international legal frameworks, trafficking continues to thrive through well-organized networks exploiting the lack of enforcement, poor victim identification, and inadequate rehabilitation mechanisms. Overcoming these challenges requires a collaborative effort across all sectors and disciplines, underscoring the vital role of collective action in achieving a more equitable, sustainable future for all.
